Where Do We Go From Here?

I recently received a survey of statistics on the Catholic Church from the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate (CARA). CARA is a national, non-profit, Georgetown University-affiliated research center that conducts social scientific studies about the Catholic Church. To my knowledge it is considered the most reliable source of statistical data on the Church.

Among the large collection of data, five categories interested me most of all. I've listed them in the chart below (numbers have been rounded to the nearest thousand).

	1965	1980	2017
Total Priests	59,000	58,000	37,000
Religious Sisters	180,000	127,000	46,000
Lay Ministers		(1990) 22,000	40,000
Parishes	18,000	19,000	17,000
Catholic Population	48,500,000	56,800,000	74,300,000

The number of priests in the US has declined 37% from the year 1965 to 37,000 today. My suspicion is that the median age of priests is presently in the 60's, so that the number of priests will continue to decline over the next decade.

But the decline—74%—in the number of religious sisters is even more drastic. Here, too, I suspect the median age of religious sisters is well into the 60's, so this decline, too, will undoubtedly continue.

But interestingly, look at the number of lay ministers. In 1980, CARA was not even tracking this category, but the number has almost doubled since 1990 and is now larger than the total number of priests. This means that there are more lay people working in parish ministry than there are ordained priests.

The number of parishes has remained fairly constant—down only 6% since 1965. If you find this surprising, it may be because parishes have been closing in the Northeast (in cities like Philadelphia) as new parishes are being founded in the South, reflecting the migration of so many Catholics to the South and Southwest. But overall in the US, the number of Catholics has increased by 53% since 1965, no doubt due to the increased number of Hispanics and other immigrants into the country.

I'm probably oversimplifying the data, but the patterns are clear: the numbers of priests and religious sisters are way down. The participation of the laity in church ministry is way up. And the Catholic population has increased, though this probably has to be balanced against the decline in Church participation among so many Catholics today.

What do you make of this? A couple of observations:

First, there's a lot to be alarmed about, in particular regarding "religious vocations." And so it's natural to ask who is at fault. I find that people tend to blame their ideological opponents for causing damage to the Church. And so we hear that everything was fine until Vatican II came along. Or the conservative popes held back the Church and turned away progressively-minded people. Or the relativism of secular culture has undermined religious fervor. Or young people today lack moral principles and have capitulated to materialism. Or trust in institutions of all kinds is weakened today by the rampant narcissism in American culture. Or. . .The list goes on. Maybe all or some of these factors have had an influence to some degree. I'm not adverse myself to lashing my favorite enemies to the whipping post and pointing an accusing finger.

Change is not unknown in the history of the Church. But for the Catholic Church in America, looking back, the twentieth century was a time of relative stability and rather extraordinary growth. So maybe we were lulled into a false sense of security. The twenty-first century, on the other hand, is probably going to be a time of critical challenges and major changes. Clearly, the future Church is not going to be a clergy-led institution even twenty years from now, the way it has been in our previous experience. This significant change seems to be just over the horizon, but surprisingly little is being done to anticipate this change. Maybe this is due to the impression that all that lies ahead is serious decline and diminishment. And who wants to prepare for that? Better to live in denial.

But I wonder if there's a deeper analysis that's called for. St Ignatius taught the practice of discernment, by which he meant that we should try to decipher where the "good spirit" is leading us as opposed to the influences of the "evil spirit." Can we look at the numbers and see any sign of the Holy Spirit moving among us? To recognize the Holy Spirit one must be free, open to challenging truths, because sometimes the Spirit breathes where it wills, not necessarily where we will. It may be hard to accept the real graces the Spirit is offering to the Church today because they are not the graces we want.

So at this point in time, given what you know of the present circumstances confronting the Church, where do you think the Spirit is leading the Church? Just a question worth pondering.

Bringing Communion to the Homebound

When people are ill or indisposed and confined to home, they can remain connected to our shared worship by receiving Communion at home. If you or a family member, friend or neighbor (with their approval of course), would like to receive Communion at home, contact the Parish Rectory so that we can arrange for a parish Eucharistic Minister to visit.

If you or anyone you know would like to become a Catholic, Contact Father Ed O'Donnell at eodonnell@oldstjoseph.org. The process begins in the fall.
